BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCHES

Antoine Marchal (d. 1816) was a man of substance in Vincennes, Indiana, in the first two decades of the nineteenth century. From 1802 to 1805 Marchal was administrator of the estate of Claude Coupin, who had died intestate, leaving an estate mainly of debts. The list of Marchal's goods at his death in 1816 shows that he had considerable property, and perhaps was in the leather business.

Hyacinth Lasselle (1777-1842) was a French trader, a lieutenant and then a major general in the Indiana militia. He married Julia Bossoron, daughter of a fur trader, and they had four children. In 1820, in a suit arranged by a group of lawyers to test a constitutional provision, Lasselle's slave Polly sued him for her freedom. She lost her case in circuit court, but won on appeal to the Indiana Supreme Court.

General Washington Johnston (1776-1833; General is a name, not a title) was born in Culpeper County, Virginia, and moved to Vincennes in 1793. He was a lawyer, having passed the bar examination in 1801. He served as postmaster in Vincennes in 1801-1802 and 1803-1812. He was a member of the territorial legislature from 1805 to 1811, and then held multiple positions as state attorney general (1811-1814), auditor (1813), and treasurer (1813-1814). In 1815 he was listed as owning a theater and a bookstore in Vincennes. From 1818 to 1832 he was on the bench.

Perhaps Johnston's most important achievement was his 1808 report to the territorial assembly arguing against slavery on both legal and moral grounds. In 1809, at a time when Masonry was still unpopular, he founded a Masonic lodge in Vincennes.
