BIOGRAPHICAL/HISTORICAL SKETCH

The Elmhurst mansion at the south edge of Connersville, in Fayette County, Indiana, was home to political leaders, a station on the underground railroad, a sanatorium, an exclusive girls' school, a military institute, and finally, a Masonic lodge.

The house was originally built in 1831 by pioneer statesman Oliver H. Smith, then a member of Congress from Indiana. The second occupant of the house was another congressman, Caleb B. Smith, who later served as Secretary of the Interior during part of President Lincoln's administration.

The mansion was an important station of the pre-Civil War underground railway. The trail of the road by which escaped slaves were smuggled to freedom divided there at the Old Elm Farm, as the estate was then known.

A third congressman, Samuel W. Parker, acquired the mansion in 1850. He was a devout conservationist and is given credit for planting many of the trees that surround the house. After his return from Washington he became president of the Junction Railroad Company and the Whitewater Canal. He gave invaluable support to the career of Henry Clay, who was a visitor to the mansion. It is said that canal boats would ring their bells as they passed the mansion in honor of Parker.

The estate became the property of Senator James Nelson Huston (1849-1927) in 1881. He spent $44,000 to remodel the structure. He added the wings to the house and the massive columns that adorn the porch. He added some huge fireplaces carved of red sandstone imported from Italy. Huston designated one room in the mansion for the exclusive use of Benjamin Harrison and his wife. Huston managed Harrison's political campaign and became United States Treasurer when Harrison took office. During Huston's tenure, the estate was known as Elm Park, but also became known as "The White Home of Indiana." Most of the photographs in this collection were taken around 1895, when the mansion was the Huston home. Pictured in the collection are the bedrooms of his children: William, born 11 January 1875, and Marie, born 5 August 1877.

In 1901 Dr. Andrew Daum built an annex of twenty-six rooms to the house and turned it into a sanatorium. Following Daum's death, the sanatorium was operated by Dr. W.J. Porter, whose wife gave the estate its name of Elmhurst.

From 1906 to 1909 the mansion was the summer home of a Pennsylvania family. Then in 1909 the property was acquired by Isabel Cressler and Caroline Summer, who established the Elmhurst School for Girls. It was an exclusive school that limited its enrollment to twenty-four students from wealthy and prominent families of the Midwest. The school closed in 1929. The estate then became the Pennington Military Institute, which operated for only one year. Around 1940 the mansion became the lodge of the Connersville Masons.

SCOPE AND CONTENT NOTE

This collection consists of thirty-one photographs, a reprinted article, and three newspaper clippings pertaining to what is now known as the Elmhurst Mansion. The collection is arranged into four series, as detailed below.

Series 1, James N. Huston Residence Photographs, ca. 1895: This series is composed of twenty-eight mounted photographs taken around 1895, during the time the mansion was the home of James N. Huston. All but two of these photographs are interior views.

Series 2, Elmhurst School for Girls Photographs, ca. 1915: This series contains three photographs of exterior views of the estate grounds taken around 1915 when the estate was home to the Elmhurst School for Girls.

Series 3, Reprinted Article: This series consists of one article about a visit to the Elmhurst School for Girls, titled “Elmhurst Films: Being Some Impressions of an Unusual School” by Grace Willard. It was reprinted from Country Life in America, 1 July 1912.

Series 4, Newspaper Clippings: This series includes copies of three newspaper clippings that provide accounts of the history of the Elmhurst Mansion and its various inhabitants from the original owner to the Connersville Masons. One article is from 1923, one is from 1950, and the other’s date is unknown.
