HISTORICAL SKETCH

Before the advent of photography, if the average person wanted a portrait done, a miniature painting or a silhouette were the only practical and affordable options. The daguerreotype process of photography, which was first made public in 1839, had low light sensitivity that required an exposure time of about fifteen minutes. Therefore, it was not practical for portraits, because people generally could not hold still for that long. By 1841, a more light-sensitive process was available, which required an exposure time of 10 to 60 seconds. That improvement allowed for the possibility of portrait photography. By 1850, there was a growing demand for portrait photography, but it remained too expensive for the average person.

Because portrait photography was a rare investment in the early years of the medium, most people expected to have no more than one portrait made of themselves. Given the high child mortality rate in the 1800s, for many families the only opportunity to have a photograph of a child lost early in life might be a post-mortem portrait. Elderly people who passed away might never have had a portrait made while living, so a post-mortem portrait would have been the only way for their loved ones to keep a likeness of them.

By 1850, every major U.S. city had portrait studios that operated much like an assembly line. The cost of having a photographic portrait done soon dropped drastically. By that time, it still required ten to twenty seconds of holding still during the exposure to yield an acceptably sharp image. Studios used props to help the people maintain a steady pose. Subjects were encouraged not to smile because it was much more difficult to hold a smile naturally and steadily for a long exposure. Thus, many early portraits show serious facial expressions.

The carte-de-visite (CDV), or visiting card portrait, which was patented in France in 1854, is a stiff card that measures about 4 ¼ by 2 ½ inches, with a photograph measuring slightly smaller attached to it. This format became in great demand for portraiture by 1859, essentially replacing the daguerreotype because it was much less expensive, more convenient, and multiple prints could be made from a single negative.

In 1866 in England, the cabinet card was introduced. The cabinet card is a photographic format that consists of a print approximately 5 ½ x 4 inches mounted on stiff cardboard that measures 6 ½ x 4 ½ inches. By 1880, cartes-de-visite had been gradually replaced by the popularity of this larger format. Large studio portraits became popular in the 1890s, gradually replacing the use of cabinet cards.

SCOPE AND CONTENT NOTE

This collection includes formal portraits as well as informal candid and action photographs and illustrations of people. Most individuals depicted lived in Indiana. Portraits include the well-known, not well-known, and unfortunately, some unidentified people. Individual and group portraits are included. There are photographs of earlier painted portraits, which means that some individuals shown in this collection died before the indicated dates of the collection.

Do a keyword search to find all portraits of an individual. For example, James Whitcomb Riley appears in series 1 and 2, and Ernie Pyle appears in series 1 and 4.

The collection is arranged into nine series, as follows:

Series 1, Identified Portraits: This series is composed of portraits of individuals, pairs, or small groups, and is arranged alphabetically by last name.

Series 2, Family Group Portraits: This series includes portraits of two or more members of the same family and is arranged alphabetically by last name. In cases where there is more than one surname due to marriage, the family is listed under the surname that members have in common.

Series 3, Group Portraits -- Organizations, Companies, etc.: This series contains group portraits from a variety of types of groups, such as student organizations, employees, clubs and fraternal organizations, church groups, county officials or political groups, and groups gathered by profession such as librarians or streetcar workers.

Series 4, Group Portraits -- Military: This series is composed of military groups and is arranged alphabetically by name of regiment or description of the group.

Series 5, Group Portraits -- Sports Teams: This series includes portraits of various sports teams, arranged alphabetically by name of the location.

Series 6, Portraits of Non-Hoosiers: This series depicts people not known to have ever lived in Indiana. It is primarily made up of well-known people and includes some formal portraits and some photographs of non-Hoosiers visiting Indiana.

Series 7, Unidentified Portraits: This series is composed of portraits of unidentified individuals and small groups. In some cases the photographer and location are designated.

Series 8, Unidentified Family Portraits: This series includes group portraits that appear to be of families at their homes, but the family names are unknown. Photographer and location are noted when known.

Series 9, Unidentified Group Portraits: This series contains portraits of groups that are not identified. Some appear to be theatrical and church groups. Photographer and location are noted when known.
