HISTORICAL SKETCH

Ford Motor Company's relationship with Indianapolis dates back to 1903 when one of the first orders for the Model A was assembled in the city. In 1914, the company began using Indianapolis as one of its regional assembly plants and constructed a facility on East Washington Street. Cars continued to be assembled on the site until 1932, and the buildings were used as offices until 1942.

Ford resumed production of automobiles in Indianapolis in 1956 with the construction of a new plant on English Avenue that produced steering gear assemblies for cars sold in North America. In 1992, the factory was enlarged and upgraded to produce power steering assemblies for cars made in Europe. By the mid-1990s, the plant employed over 2,000 people. The decline in auto sales combined with improved technology from hydraulic to electric steering systems forced the plant to close in 2011
