BIOGRAPHICAL SKETCH

Julius R. Frederick was born in either Germany or Ohio (two sources listed below are at variance on the matter) in 1852. In either case, both his parents were from Germany. He grew up near St. Mary’s, Ohio, and joined the U.S. Army around 1876. He was stationed at various posts in Missouri and spent five years under Colonel Nelson Miles fighting in the Indian Wars. In 1881 he volunteered for the International Polar Expedition to Lady Franklin Bay, commonly referred to as the Lady Franklin Bay Expedition or the Greely Expedition. Lieutenant A.W. Greely of the 5th U.S. Cavalry led the expedition to perform investigations about the nature of the magnetic pole, to establish a permanent international polar station at Discovery Harbour in Greenland, and to attempt to reach the Farthest North. Private Julius Frederick of Company L, 2nd Cavalry, joined the expedition as the regular cook. At a height of five feet two inches, he was known as "Shorty" Frederick among expedition members. Among the twenty-five men there were an astronomer, a photographer, soldiers, and meteorologists.

The expedition departed in July 1881 bound for Greenland. Over the next three years its members engaged in exploration and scientific observation. The members of the team interacted with the native Eskimos, explored the coast of Greenland, and attempted to reach the farthest point north. Relief vessels were supposed to arrive in September 1883 to refresh the team’s supplies, but the ships never arrived. Supplies soon dwindled down to nothing and the members of the team began dying of disease, starvation, and thirst. On 6 April 1884 a much-weakened Frederick went with the group’s photographer Sergeant George W. Rice southward to Baird Inlet to recover frozen beef for their starving comrades. Rice died in Frederick’s arms hours after they had reached their goal (an engraving of this scene appears in A.W. Greely’s Three Years of Arctic Service [1886], vol. 2, facing p. 286). Frederick buried him and then, although near death himself, managed to bring back as much of the beef as possible. In reward for his courage and bravery in the face of death, Lt. Greely field-promoted Frederick to the rank of sergeant. Julius Frederick was the first man to hear the bells of the ship Thetis as it arrived 22 June 1884 to rescue the surviving members of the expedition. Out of the twenty-five men who ventured out with the expedition in 1881, only six survived.

The survivors A.W. Greely, Maurice Connell, Francis Long, David Brainard, Henry Biederbick, and Julius Frederick returned to the United States and remained lifelong friends, supporting each other in times of need. The men fought for years to obtain just compensation for their duties. They also worked with several congressmen in their attempts to receive military pensions, and Congress finally passed several bills in their favor. Greely remained in the U.S. Army, where he was appointed head of the signal corps; Brainard went to work for the War Department; and Biederbick became the Secretary of the Arctic Club.
Julius Frederick came to Indianapolis, eventually to work for the U.S. Weather Bureau. His name appears in the city’s Polk directories first in 1886, as a Julius R. Frederick working at a saloon at 665 Virginia Avenue and living at 36 Shelby St. The next year Frederick appears as a confectioner, living and working at 53 N. Pennsylvania St. From 1888 to 1891, Frederick is shown residing at 336 S. Alabama St. During these years, his occupation is listed as engineer in 1888 and clerk in 1891 (no occupation is shown for the two middle years). Finally, in 1893 he is listed as an assistant observer for the Weather Bureau, living at “104 (W P),” or Woodruff Place. (His address in the 1900 census is given as 104 Middle Drive, Woodruff Place.)

Frederick married Laura Keckler in or around 1885 and had two daughters, naming them Thetis (born in 1886) and Sabine (born in 1889) after the ship that rescued him and the cape where he was stranded for two years, respectively. Frederick’s life in Indianapolis seems to have been happy and productive. He worked in the Majestic Building in the Weather Bureau office. He remained in touch with his comrades. He was friends with P.E. McDonnell of Chicago’s McDonnell Odometer Company, who tried to interest Frederick in a plan to build an airship in order to reach the North Pole before Admiral Peary. The Indianapolis press was very interested in Frederick’s life and experiences and wrote several articles about him, including his meeting with the famous Arctic explorer Fridtjof Nansen, and the newspapers kept readers apprised of Congressional action to give him and his fellow survivors due compensation for their services. According to the answers he gave on a Weather Bureau survey, he was temperate, did not smoke, and did not know how to operate a typewriter. He did own and operate a bicycle. Frederick was a member of the Marion Club in Indianapolis as well as the Army and Navy League, and his friends inducted him into the Arctic Club shortly before his death.

Health problems had plagued Frederick ever since his service in the Arctic and the doctors eventually diagnosed him with stomach cancer. In spring of 1903 he was injured while trying to calm a runaway horse. His health deteriorated rapidly in 1903 until he was confined to his bed in autumn. His comrades wrote him letters of encouragement, wishing him health and declaring their unwavering loyalty to him. They praised Frederick for his courage and good nature and seemed optimistic about his recovery. Julius R. Frederick died in Indianapolis on 6 January 1904.

SCOPE AND CONTENT NOTE
The collection contains documentation and artifacts relating to Julius R. Frederick’s participation in the Greely expedition of 1881–84, including diary entries written by Frederick, a Winchester repeating rifle he used during the expedition, and a razor and a knife and fork. The materials also document his life in Indiana, attempts to get Congress to pay the Lady Franklin Bay survivors pensions, Frederick's illness and death in 1903 and 1904, and the sale and transfer of the collection to Peter Krieg in 1978. There are a variety of photographs, including a photograph that is likely Frederick holding his rifle in the Arctic (as well as many other pictures of Frederick), an autographed picture of a reception held in his honor upon his return from the Arctic, and photographs of his daughters Thetis and Sabine as babies, children, and adults. There are also pictures of his house in Woodruff Place in Indianapolis, a photograph possibly of himself dressed in polar-exploration gear, a photograph of the six surviving members of the Lady Franklin Bay Expedition, photographs of A.W. Greely’s family, and several other unidentified family photographs.

The collection also contains miscellaneous items relating to Frederick’s life in Indianapolis including his license to own and operate a bicycle, receipts from his payment of Marion Club Dues and the Marion Club Constitution, and receipts from the purchase of lumber and shingles for his house. There are also drafts of Frederick’s personal letters and Weather Bureau correspondence, and a survey that he filled out.

The collection includes letters written to Julius Frederick and his wife during Frederick’s last year of life. Henry Biederbick, David Brainard, and A.W. Greely wrote letters wishing his swift recovery and giving him encouragement. There are also letters from P.E. McDonnell concerning an airship venture to reach the North Pole before Peary. A letter from Brainard (9 January 1904) consoles Mrs. Frederick on the death of her husband.

There are also numerous copies of Congressional bills relating to the fight for compensation for the survivors of the Greely expedition, as well as letters to and from congressman Overbeck about this legislative process.

Several well-worn books are part of the collection. Three Years of Arctic Service (2 vols.) by A.W. Greely contains an account of the Lady Franklin Bay Expedition, with pictures and engravings, including an engraving recreating the scene where Frederick holds the dying Sgt. Rice in his arms. There are two copies of the promotional literature from Charles Scribner’s Sons about Three Years of Arctic Service. The White World contains chapters by Lady Franklin Bay survivors David Brainard and Henry Biederbick. Copies of two books, The White World and The Great Frozen Sea, are inscribed to Julius by Brainard and Greely, respectively.

The materials in the collection were donated to the Indiana Historical Society in 2003 by Christy and Lisa Krieg, daughters of Peter Krieg (1937-2002), who had purchased them in 1978 from Ruth Epply, granddaughter of Julius and Laura Frederick, daughter of Sabine Frederick Epply. Peter Krieg was himself an adventurer, a balloonist and outdoors enthusiast, who drowned in West Virginia during a canoeing trip that began in Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania, and was to end in Madison, Indiana, in June 2002. The collection contains a few items relating to the purchase of the collection, including an affidavit from Ruth Epply certifying that the rifle Peter Krieg purchased as part of the collection was her grandfather’s, and information from the Chequer Board Antique Shop about the purchase of the rifle. Secondary sources on the expedition dating from the period after Julius Frederick’s death, like the American Heritage and National Geographic issues, may have been collected by either Epply or Krieg.

The collection came with no discernible original order, and was placed into several series by the processor. There is some thematic overlap between the first and second series, “Arctic Exploration, ca. 1874–86” and “Indianapolis, 1896–1904,” since Frederick was concerned with the Greely Expedition long after he returned from it. Letters from comrades on the expedition, clippings about polar exploration, and one of several books (this one with an inscription from 1903) are all to be found in the second series. What divides the two series is not subject matter but chronology, as there is a gap of about a decade (1886 unidentified photographs, and series 4 contains collection documentation from the period after Frederick’s death in 1904.
