HISTORICAL SKETCH

Railroadmen's Federal Savings and Loan Association was founded in 1887 as Railroadmen's Building and Savings Association. It was founded at the initiative of William Taylor Cannon (1857-1931), who was then paymaster of the Indianapolis Union Railway, and who found himself operating a sort of informal savings bank for his workers from a drawer in his desk. Obtaining the cooperation of the division managers of the other railroads operating through Indianapolis's Union Station, the association obtained a state charter. Until 1917 Cannon was executive secretary, (in fact acting as president from 1913) operating from an office in Union Station. In 1917 Cannon retired from the railroad and became president. At the same time the association erected a building of its own on Virginia Avenue, designed by Cannon's son, Fermor S. Cannon. At William T. Cannon's death in 1931, Fermor Cannon succeeded him, serving first as president and then (1936-1958) as board chairman. Change from a state to a federal charter in 1935 led to the name change to Railroadmen's Federal.

The original purpose of the association had been to help railroad men to save enough to build homes of their own. Successful management of the enterprise attracted other depositors. In 1926 Railroadmen's was the largest building and loan association in the world, and by 1930 its assets totaled $60 million. Emphasis on building continued; in the 1940s the association took a lead in remodeling eyesores in decaying neighborhoods, in selling World War II bonds and in financing homes for veterans. By 1955, however, only two members of the staff had any connection with railroads.

The association built new and expanded offices in 1963, with an escalator between floors. As general conditions changed in the banking business, Railroadmen's responded. To make itself more accessible as the city expanded, it built branch banks beginning in 1972. As businesses and individuals needed bigger loans from lenders with greater resources, Railroadmen's merged with Brown County Federal Savings and Loan Association in 1981 and with Heritage Federal in 1987. Unhurt by the S & L crisis in 1986, Railroadmen's changed from mutual to stock ownership in April 1987. In 1990 it bought Archer Federal Savings and Loan in Chicago. Then, as its stock rose from $7.25 a share in 1990 to $13.75 in 1991 and to $20.25 in 1992, it became subject to the same trend. In 1993 it was purchased by Huntington Bancshares of Ohio, and took on the new name of Huntington National Bank of Indiana.
